She says she will work to have the bond issues deferred.

"It shows a consistent lack of proper planning," Frankland argues in an indirect swipe at Barton and Krum, both of whom are on the Planning Commission.

So far, mainly conservatives have come out against the bonds and both the Chamber of Commerce and the County Council of PTAs have refused to endorse one or more of the bonds. (Both groups are viewed as conservative.)

With projected deficits of $110 million over the next five years, Metrorail is looming as one of the major issues both from the standpoint of financing and development. One of the November bonds totaling $25 million will go toward Metro costs.

"We need a full and complete cost accounting of Metro capital costs as well as its operating budget," says Frankland.

While Frankland and Grotos are reluctant to propose delaying Metro's opening for another year, the candidates are in favor of holding it up "if it means getting control of Metro costs," which Frankland says are completely out of control.

Grotos says she will oppose heavy development around Metro stations and says she would consider a parking ban around the stations. Both say they will encourage mass transit but not to the extent of committing 1-66 funds.

Since the majority of county dwellers are Democrats both Frankland and Grotos have needed to support issues which will garner a broad base of support.

Financially they have not been able to put together the organization that is backing Barton and Krum. Since they merged their campaigns in September the Grotos-Frankland organization has collected about $6,500 in contributions — a little more than half that collected by the ABC candidates.

According to Campaign treasurer and former board member Ned Thomas most of the donations have been in the $10 to $20 range. The largest of the contributions, $500, was made by Charles M. Delashmutt, owner of Barcroft Apartments, says Thomas.

The Arlington Republic Women's Club has donated $400 and is second largest contributor. Preston Cruthers, who chairs state delegate candidate Jade West's campaign, has given $250. Harrison Mann, a former state house delegate has donated $200 and Bob Peck, of Bob Peck Chevrolet, has donated $200, says Thomas.

And while Grotos is well known — she ran for the Board last year and lost but netted more than 18,000 votes — Frankland is a newcomer to Arlington Politics.

The Arlington resident, who lives at 2674 Marcey Road, was initiated during the debate over the controversial transfer of O.U. Johansen, Washington-Lee High School principal last spring.

Schools and the Johansen incident have been one of their stronger debating points and both say they would like to see changes in the School Board.

Frankland charges that Larry Cuban, school superintendent, is not qualified and said he plans on reviewing what he has characterized as a top-heavy school administrative staff.

"I will work for an elected school board and also call for an investigation to determine if there had been any laws violated, (in the Johansen matter)," says Frankland. Grotos shares similar sentiments and has stressed a return to traditional academics in the schools. "It's good to have flexibility but I think we've gone too far," she says.

"In the first place, until May 30 I didn't even know I was going to run," Frankland recalls. In the early 70s, he says, he was first approached by the Democrats as a possible candidate, but refused to be considered.

"The main thing that has drawn him into politics, he says, 'is the arrogance of the School Board and the County Board and their failure that the public will was not carried out,'" in the Johansen case.

And because this is his first try, Frankland likes to classify himself as a "citizen politician" and uses this term to explain why he has adopted the independent status.

Even though endorsed by the GOP, "I came in laterally, I did not work my way up in the party," he says.

His opponents, however have been quick to point out that he is lacking in experience. Frankland counters, "By being 15 years older than the two ABC candidates, I've had more experience on the local, national and international level."

"I have a degree in journalism and appreciate the problem of taking an idea from one group and communicating it to another," he says. "This is the most important thing I can contribute."

Frankland also points to his experience as an executive vice-president of the National Silver Users Association where he serves as spokesman, some-time lobbyist and analyst for the silver industry.

He proposed to establish a public affairs office in the Court House to make it easier for people instead of more difficult to communicate."

GROTOS...Board not being honest its more of an attitude," he says.

Grotos has also played upon the theme of communication and has called the ABC group, of which all present board members belong, "a machine Mayor Daley would be proud of."

"All of this is what scares me about this one-party group. If you're not a member of that group you can't get in to see anybody on that County Board," Frankland charges.

Both candidates have called for limited and balanced growth as have all their opponents, but lacking the expertise of Barton and Krum, have been vague on how they propose to carry out those plans.

All the candidates have said they will try to attract new retail business into the county, which over the past several years has been declining.

"Most of them are saying, boy I can hardly wait to get out," says Grotos. Frankland says the situation calls for a change of attitude on the part of the County Board.

Planning and growth, in fact, has been one of Grotos' favorite themes and one on which she has constantly attacked her democratically-endorsed opponents.

She points to the 22-story Tower Villas, on Fairfax Drive as one of the "conflicts of interest" of her opponents. The building was constructed within the last five years, and stands starkly among low level town houses and single family dwellings. "I don't favor that kind of new growth," she charges, alluding to Barton and Krum's stance on limited growth.

The tactic has proved partially successful. During question and answer periods at several candidates' nights her opponents have lost valuable debate time answering for the County Board and the Planning Commission about charges in which they often had no direct part. Barton, for example had opposed the rezoning for the Tower Villas project.

Grotos has also taken the ABC candidates to task for the headaches of Metro construction and areas impacted by heavy commuter traffic. "The older neighborhoods are virtually being squeezed out as if caught in a vice."

She has also used this rationale to fend off charges that she refused to take a stand during the 1-66 debate.

"They say it's a state road, I accept the decision," she said in an interview. "It's a dead issue as far as I'm concerned." The problem, however, she says, is that the defeat of 1-66 has set the county back 20 years.

"They're not being honest or realistic, she charges of the County Board. "They're just dumping on the rest of Arlington." Grotos is referring to plans to widen 19 of the County's highways into major thoroughfares.

"They're outdated highways," she claims and by expanding them they would create safety factors as well as further impact the county.

Burroughs from page one

Burroughs charged.

At a Lyon Village candidates night Monday, Iandola produced the surprise draft report which he claimed he received from persons in the Arlington Police Department.

Holding up a photocopied page, he said came from the report, Iandola charged that figures in his possession showed the prosecutor's conviction rate was substantially lower than Burroughs claimed.

In Iandola's version, the section of the report shows for example that 731 persons were charged with assault, 14 were convicted and 616 were acquitted or dismissed.

The figures appear in three columns, in the Iandola version and appear to have been photocopied from the same page.

Burroughs, however, has produced his own version of the report which lists the same figures on two different pages, which Burroughs claims are in no way related.

While Iandola's chart has only one listing entitled "Persons Charged" During Fiscal Year 1975, Burroughs copy shows two different tables indicating persons charged in one and the number of court dispositions in the other.

"He's taking advantage of this because the figures come close to adding up," said the prosecutor. "We push about as many persons out of the system as the police push into the system," he explained.

Burroughs said the table which shows court dispositions lists only those charges levied against someone arrested, not necessarily those for which the suspect eventually went to trial.

During the Lyon Village meeting Iandolo jumped up when it was his turn to speak and began waving a mimeographed report in the air exclaiming he had documented proof that the Commonwealth's Attorney's conviction claims were false.

Later, the peripatetic Iandolo began passing out his photocopied version but refused to let a reporter see the full Police report.

When asked how he received the report, which he claimed has not yet been released, he replied: "Do you really want to know where I got it, I got it from friends in the police department who hate his guts," pointing over his shoulder to Burroughs.

Burroughs said that comparing charges with defendants is like comparing "apples with oranges" because most defendants have multiple charges and are seldom prosecuted on all of them.

"How long do you think I could stay in office with a 15 per cent conviction rate?" Burroughs asked rhetorically in an interview. "More people plead guilty," he answered himself.

"I also don't agree with these figures, by the way," he added. "The police department and the courts get their signals crossed all the time."

Iandolo, who was defeated by Burroughs in an election last year for the office when William J. Hassan retired because of health, has kept up a steady stream of criticism aimed at Burroughs' claims of "one of the highest conviction rates in the area."

His reply to the charges; "He's telling you a pack of lies."

schools as possible while I am on the board."

"I anticipate the Board of Supervisors will receive a favorable evaluation" of the student member, he said. "It all comes down to presenting a good image of the student representative."

He said his position on the board "will not be to gripe and complain, but to constructively make suggestions reflecting the interests of the students." He said he would try to further suggestions made to the school board by the area and county-wide student advisory councils.

The student school board member, with full voting privileges and a $3,500 salary is apparently unique in the country.

"We're being watched by a lot of people," Taylor said, pointing out that Montgomery County is considering a student member for its school board.

Herrity had originally suggested setting up a committee of supervisors, school board members and students to consider the possibility of replacing the student representative with a non-voting committee of students to advise the school officials.

Rufus Phillips, Supervisor, Dranesville, made the motion adopted Oct. 6, saying, "You don't abolish an institution because someone who occupies it does not live up to what society expects...Three of the four members have served very well, and now one is accused of a crime. We cannot insure all our institutions against human frailty."

Taylor defeated 19 other candidates for the nomination, winning on the ninth ballot with 59 of the 106 votes cast by the delegates.

He said he plans to attend the Massachusetts Institute of Technology this fall and to major in theoretical physics. He was previously temporary chairman of the Area IV

Lecos Elected

Fairfax County School Board Chairman Mary Anne Lecos was selected last week to serve as president-elect of the Virginia School Boards Association. The election was held at the Association's annual convention in Richmond.

Mrs. Lecos is the senior member of the Fairfax County School Board in length of service, having been appointed as the Mason District member in January 1968. She was elected vice chairman in January 1972 and became chairman in July 1973.

A graduate of DePaul University, Mrs. Lecos holds a master's degree from American University, and has done graduate work in education at the University of Virginia and Virginia Tech. She has taught elementary school in Morton Grove, Ill., and Parris Island, S.C., and at the time of her appointment to the School Board was a teacher's aide in the Bailey's Project at Bailey's Elementary School.
