Democrat Kinney Fights Broyhill

By MARILYN McGINTY
SUN Staff Writer

Tenth district voters decide Tuesday whether a lot of money and a new candidate are enough to beat a heretofore unbeatable congressman.

With 16 years in the House, Republican U.S. Rep. Joel T. Broyhill, 48, has proven impossible to beat in eight consecutive elections. His opponent, David B. Kinney, 47, is a political newcomer who has piled more than $119,000 into his campaign.

So far, Broyhill has conducted his usual low-key campaign, visiting shopping centers and voter receptions with "old friends," and refusing to debate Kinney or appear on the same program with him. "I don't want the campaign to sink to the personality level, where the issue is not foremost," Broyhill said.

Kinney, on the other hand, speaks at every public opportunity, at five or more coffee gatherings a day and several candidates' meetings a night. He has spent thousands of dollars on television and radio spots, and has shelled out $77,000 of his own money for the campaign so far.

Not so with Broyhill. He, unlike Kinney, has large sums of money in contributions, and has had the backing of most business firms and private individuals who contribute $500 to $1,000 each to back their candidate.

As the campaigning method are different between the two candidates, so is the audience. For Broyhill, the usual audience is composed of familiar faces, the older Republicans or independents who have voted for him since his 1952 squeek initiation into public life.

For Kinney, the crowds are younger, and more bouyant. Kinney's campaign workers are the young dissidents, the free-thinking young adults who want a voice in making the government more liberal than conservative Broyhill's offerings.

It is Broyhill's conservativism that has provided most of the issues for the current campaign. Though no issue is branded new in this campaign, Kinney has provided the questions that many young voters are asking this year.

To the question, "What are you doing about federal spending for the food stamp, poverty and impact area aid programs," Broyhill answers, "I don't want to spend your money foolishly. I think the federal programs are bogged down in bureaucratic red tape and I think the money could be better spent."

To the question of "What have you done for Northern Virginia," Broyhill takes much of the credit for legislation creating or improving many of the Potomac bridges, points to his amended parking bill, highway improvements and scores of other bills he has seen passed.

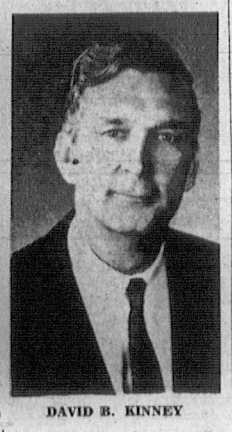

To Broyhill, there are only three major issues in the current campaign. They are the war in Vietnam, law and order, and the economy. Throughtout the campaign, he has said that he feels the war should not be an issue because the country should stand behind the President. He is admittedly a hawk on the issue, saying "the United States must admit that diplomacy has failed and commit full American strength and power to bring the war in Vietnam to an end."

Kinnney has not been as vociferous as Broyhill on the war, but has proposed a change in the draft laws that would put names of eligible 19-year-olds in a pool, and make them subject to call for only a year.

Midway in the campaign, retired Air Force Lt. Col. Louis A. Guenther, 64, of 2842 Brook Drive, Falls Church, announced his candidacy as a write-in, principally on a Vietnam war plank and drawing on the area's youth to help put him across to the voters.

U.S. REP. JOEL T. BROYHILL

DAVID B. KINNEY

Little was heard from Guenther until Friday when he announced that largely because of President Johnson's total bombing halt on North Vietnam, he was withdrawing from the race in favor of Kinney.

On law and order, Broyhill has proposed a bill which would place all of the various police forces in Washington under a commissioner answerable to Congress. Broyhill has on many occassions said he agrees with some of former Gov. George C. Wallace's declarations on law and order, but that he does not go as far as the third party candidate and does not want his constituten's to "waste their vote" on Wallace.

Kinney, on the other hand, has charged Broyhill with "fostering fear and anxiety" with a "Wallace brand of law and order." He charged Broyhill with "testing the political winds" and "deciding to cite terror in the streets, to urge 'shoot to kill,' and to talk about impeaching our judges."

Broyhill, citing crime figures prepared for him by the Library of Congress, has said on several occasions that "it seems the vogue now to choose the law you want to defy. We don't have to choose sides as to whether or not we are against crime and police brutality. The only way to cut back law breaking and violence is to let the individuals who inflict themselves on the innocent pay and pay dearly for their crimes."

Broyhill introduced one crime bill protecting bus and taxi drivers in Washington, and provided preliminary measures and revisions in the Omnibus Crime Control Act passed in the 90th Congress. He was an active supporter of anti-crime measures.

Kinney, unlike Broyhill, cannot stand on a voting record in Congress, and has relied on proposals for new programs. Kinney wrote Gov. Mills E. Godwin in August requesting Godwin's appointment of a "blue ribbon crime commission" and establishment of a state crime laboratory. Kinney's letter urged Godwin "to seek newly released federal funds for the state crime lab and other programs to improve law enforcement, including those designed to upgrade the training and recruitment of police officials."

Kinney also has set up a seven point anti-crime program, calling for better pay for policemen, creation of a state planning agency to coordinate an "allout, coordinated attack on crime" and use of non-police personnel to allow officers to spend more time on patrols.

Broyhill has long advocated a cutback in federal spending, a position that has drawn the most attack from Kinney. Broyhill voted against Headstart funds, the Elementry and Secondary Education Act, Food Stamp Program, Medicare and a host of other federally-funded programs.

"I am not saying that the government is spending in areas where the spending is not working," he says, "but name an area in which it is not spending. Fugure out sometime how many programs you can use to solve one problem." Broyhill has attacked the present welfare system, Job Corps and the measures the Poor People's Campaign has taken toward poverty and civil rights.

As to his vote on the education bill, Broyhill has said, "In 16 years of working with federal legislation of all kinds I have never seen a distribution scheme which so flagrantly discriminates against less wealthy states and in favor of the most wealthy states as" the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1968.

He said the bill provided that the states that can afford to pay more per child get more for each child counted under the formula included.

"New York gets $416.70 while Virginia gets only the national average which currently is $255.-34. Secondly, because the wealthier states support people on welfare payments at a much higher level, they can count more children. New York counts 237,855 school-age welfare children in families receiving more than $2,-000 in welfare payments, while Virginia counts only 10,776."

Kinney proposes a broad-based program to emphasize job training expansion of Headstart and other programs for disadvantaged youths. He proposed a program designed to provide pay for federal employes comparable with private industry wages, including measures to establish a commission to recommend changes in the Hatch Act, legislation to strengthen the rights of employes' unions to bargain for federal employes and improved life insurance benefits.

Kinney has called for "tax incentives to the private sector to lend financial assistance and managerial skill, as well as for expansion of present federal commitments to assist private companies to create inner-city subsidiaries that will be managed by local residents." Kinney's proposals are many.

Since his squeak-through victory in 1952 when the 10th district was created, Broyhill has responded quickly to constitutent problems on a personal level and many say this is the basis on which he continually wins re-election, including surviving the 1964 Goldwater debacle with a 2,000-vote margin ove Augustus C. Johnson.

Area Democratic party faithful chafe at Broyhill and his record, saying that Northern Virginia should not just have an "errand boy" on Capitol Hill but an ideological leader as well.

Area Republicans are quick to respond that Broyhill is an ideological leader as well — though not of the stripe that the generally liberal Democratic party in the area obviously prefers.

Kinney is a senior partner in an Arlington law firm, and lives at 3636 N. 38th St., Arlington. A graduate of George Washington University Law School, he worked with the National Security Agency during World War II, and is a former associate county court judge, bank director and commercial real estate manager.

Broyhill, who lives at 4845 Old Dominion Drive, Arlington, was born in Hopewell and attended George Washington University. He escaped from a Nazi prison camp during World War II. He has been associated with his family's real estate ventures.

He is a former chairman of the Arlington Planning Commission and former chairman of the county's chamber of commerce. He sits on the powerful House Ways and Means Committee and on the District of Columbia Committee.

Arlington Tries Again on Bonds

ARLINGTON — For the second time in five months, Arlingtonians will go to the polls to vote on multi-million dollar school and recreation bond requests on Tuesday.

Although the present $13.77 million funding proposals are somewhat reduced from the defeated June $16.8 million figure, items involved in the school bonds requests are substantially the same as those proposed in June.

The big differences are that there have been minor cost cutbacks by the elimination of most proposed carpeting in the schools; that there are four questions instead of one package; and that the county recreational item lacks a swimming pool proposal, such as was proposed in June.

Specifically, Arlington residents will vote on the following:

- $6.9 million for additions and improvements to elementary schools
- $225,000 for an addition to the Washington-Lee High School library
- $4.15 million for a new Thomas Jefferson junior high school
- $2.5 million for community recreational facilities and planning.

If the bonds are passed for the elementary school proposal, it will mean an addition of 91 Arlington classrooms; a new 21-classroom elementary school to replace Cherrydale and Woodlawn schools; and will allow remodeling and such improvements as physical education and library space on six existing schools.

The specific North Arlington schools involved in the proposal are Page, Woodmont, Cherrydale, Taylor, Woodlawn, Lee-Reed, McKinley and Stewart Tuckahoe. In south Arlington, Abingdon and Oakridge are the two projects affected by the proposal.

The Thomas Jefferson Junior High School is not a new proposal, either. The referendum request is for a new school to replace the present Thomas Jefferson school on the "Van Every" site. At present, Thomas Jefferson students are housed in two separate buildings about 1.3 miles apart.

One of the most debated portions of the bond request is that for an addition to the Washington-Lee library. A new library will mean an addition of 15,000 square feet of space to the present facility which is used by the high school's students, the Arlington adult education program and the University of Virginia.

Last June, the bond referendum called for a $400,000 addition in contrast to this fall's $225,000 request. School officials say that the $175,000 difference will come from the remaining funds from the Dolley Madison School sale.

There has been some question whether school authorities actualy misused funds originally designated for the library addition.

School personnel say that at one time it was throught the money from the Dolley Madison sale would be adequate to finance a portion of the funds for an administration education center and the library.

The center, costing $1.5 million, was to be financed by $1 million in bonds and $500,000 from the school sale.

However, school officials claim that the 1967 county board transferred $355,000 of the school receipts to the 1967-1968 school operating budget, thus reducing the amount available for the library.

The question raised by many is whether the $355,000 is still in the construction funds or whether it was actually transfer red to the operating budget.

The last portion of the funding requests deals with county recreation facilities which, if passed, will allow the county to construct a community recreation center in conjunction with the proposed Thomas Jefferson Junior High. Also, a portion of the funds will be used for development of recreational facilities on lands already owned by the county.

Included in the recreational items proposed are a gymnasium with seating for up to 4,000 persons, four handball and three basketball courts; an auditorium with orchestra pit, rehearsal space and ressing rooms; indoor facilities with daytime space for Silver Age clubs, hobbie groups, graphic arts and an archery-rifle range; outdoor facilities which will include lighted volleyball, tennis and basketball courts and an all weather surfaced multipurpose area.

To date, there has been less organized opposition to the local bonds than there was in June. At that time, many persons said they opposed holding a special election for the school requests.

Among those endorsing the bonds are the county's chamber of commerce, the County Council of PTA's, the Arlington Education Association, the Positive Action Committee for Education, the Arlingtonians for Independent Action and the Arlington Civic Federation.

The Arlington Homeowners Federation has gone on record opposing all November bond requests.

The federation, an organization with about 130 members, is campaigning against the referendums by driving a sound truck through the county's streets. Also, it plans to circulate handbills.

A school-board appointed Citizens Committee for School and Recreation Bonds is working actively for the bonds passage and has distributed fact sheets and brochures to precinct voters.

Also, an intensive effort is being waged by the PTA's for School bonds committee sponsored by the County Council of PTA's and the individual PTA's. The workers are attempting to contact county residents in campaign.

"grass-roots public information"

A major part of their efforts is to quell rumors that the bonds' passage will mean increased busing of county children.

Instead, the PTAs are stressing that if the bonds are passed, there will be a reduction of 11 buses. They claim that a new Thomas Jefferson school will be located near the center of the attendance area to be served and will eliminate five buses that are now needed.

3 Vie for County Board Swing Seat

By RONA CHERRY
SUN Staff Writer

ARLINGTON — On the surface, the Arlington county board race has been such a lukewarm affair that many county residents were unaware recently that a battle was even being waged.

But, for many political pundits, the race is ending on a feverish note with board control and Arlington's future character lying in the balance.

In recent weeks, the candidates have sharply defined their positions and have spoken out philosophically on questions of where the county has been and on the path it should follow.

The differences, however, in philosophy are just as distinct as the differences in the candidates themselves.

Independent Joseph S. Wholey, 33, is running with the backing of the backing of the Democratic party and the non-partisan Arlingtonians for a Better County. A former director of evaluation with the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Wholey is now senior staff member at the Urban Institute.

The board hopeful received a Ph.D. in philosophy from Harvard University and graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Catholic University.

His Republican opponent, A. Leslie Phillips, 47, attended Southeastern University.

An employee with the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Co., Phillips has served as a coach for local baseball and football teams.

Also running for election is Independent Reider D. Claffy who gives his age as "mature." A former stockbroker, Claffy is now employed as assistant manager of a local dairy store. The Independent is running with no organized political backing and is considered an insignificant political threat.

With the board's swing seat open, the race has become a bitter battle to assume the governing body's control.

Wholey, supported by the present board's liberal majority, has spoken out for adding officers to the county's police force to provide additional patrolling, use of existing facilities for youth centers, neighborhood service teams to bring "services to the people," and a four-point plan to protect single family and garden apartment neighborhoods.

Phillips, has not provided many program proposals and instead attacks many county policies which he claims are a result of the present board majority.

Phillips has been running his campaign by appearing at various receptions with U.S. Rep. Joel T. Broyhill, the Republican seeking reelection in Virginia's 10th district.

The Republicans admit it is a coattail strategy and hope that if Broyhill is swept into office, Phillips will win, too.

Wholey, who has spoken to county groups and associations, has not only criticized Phillips unwillingness to address county groups and debate, but also attacks the GOP candidate's outlook on issues.

Phillips has made the 14 per cent utility tax controversy the key question in the campaign. When he addresses citizens, he begins his speech by saying he is "the candidate pledged to repeal the ABC4mposed" tax.

From there, Phillips speeches are usually strong indictments of Wholey as an "advocate" of slums and as a "militant" advocate of the "forced housing ordinance, adopted over the objections of the Commonwealths attorney.

Phillips also contends that neighborhood schools are being destroyed by the "indiscriminate busing" of children and criticizes the county board for spending tax money for regional parks in Prince William County.

Wholey answers Phillips by saying he favors immediate repeal of the utility tax on gas and electric heat but says the entire tax can not be eliminated since the $4 million revenue loss would make it necessary to cut salaries and programs.

Further, he calls several of Phillips's accusations "outright lies" and "falsehoods."

So outraged by Phillips statement about the Independents advocating public housing, Wholey has sent a letter to the Fair Campaign Practices Committee charging that Phillips placed an ad with an incorrect statement in an area publication.

Wholey said he has requested the committee to investigate the use of the statement. He clarified his position recently by saying he has proposed a program to "ensure the orderly redevelopment of garden apartments" with a proposal that moderate-rent units remain available in the county so families won't be forced to move as highrise buildings are developed.

Phillips, however, calls Wholey's election charge a campaign gimmick and says the committee does not investigate complaints made on a county level.

Third candidate Claffy has spoken out for a safer county and has vehemently expressed opposition to the liquor-by-the-drink referendum saying it will increase vandalism, prostitution and crime.

Both Phillips and Wholey have voiced support for almost all the referendums on the ballot. Tuesday, Phillips has expressed reservations, however, about the placement of a new Thomas Jefferson Junior High school facility. He says there is "an obvious need" for the new school, but questions whether the Van Every site is best since it has twice been defeated by voters.

Although the campaign began quietyly with both candidates primarily defending their positions on the utility tax question, issues have developed which clearly divide the candidates on conservative and liberal lines.

If Wholey should win, the present liberal majority will remain in control through 1971.

And if Phillips should capture the seat, Republicans will have the one-vote edge at least until next year when Republican board member Dr. Kenneth M. Haggerty's term expires.

The political tension is so strong that for awhile the campaign seemed doomed to be more a match of political name-calling. For instance, after it was announced that staunch conservative Robert Peck had been named campaign advisory committee manager for Phillips' the name-calling became a battle of "right wing reactionaryism" and a "hippie come lately."

With the introduction of Peck into the campaign, there was a noticeably heightened polarization with moderate liberals gravitating towards Wholey and conservatives toward Phillips.

Students 'Elect' Nixon

FREDERICKSBURG — Republican candidate Richard M. Nixon was declared an easy victor in a mock election held at Mary Washington College.

Nixon polled 542 votes, or about 56 per cent of the 966 votes cast in the presidential contest. The total vote represented less than 50 per cent of the 2178 member student body.

Included in this vote were some ballots cast by faculty members who favored Democratic candidate Hubert H. Humphrey. Humphrey received 28 faculty votes, while Nixon received 15 and Wallace garnered a lone vote. In the combined voting Humphrey received 387 votes and Wallace was the choice of 37.

In the 8th District contest between Republican U.S. Rep. William L. Scott and his Democratic challenger Andrew H. McCutcheon, the incumbent won by a 583 to 300 vote count. Again the faculty members disagreed with the student vote, giving McCutcheon 27 votes and Scott 14.

On other issues the students and faculty alike voted overwhelmingly in favor of liquor-by-the-drink and in favor of the $81 million state bond issues. The vote went 845 to 114 in favor of liquor-by-the-drink and 821 to 91 for the bond issues.
