

Text of <https://www.washingtonpost.com/archive/local/1993/04/29/q-a-with-winslow/9c419fbo-17f1-4ee8-b2e7-e27969e3a697/> as displayed in Chrome on 25 September 2026. The Post's archive shows the opening of an article without a subscription, and refuses a direct fetch; this is the paragraph it showed, copied from the rendered page; nothing was edited. The Post's search lists the piece under 28 April 1993; the page's own address dates it 29 April 1993.

Q. A. WITH WINSLOW

The Washington Post, April 29, 1993

Benjamin Winslow was elected last week to the Arlington County Board, ending a six-year Democratic monopoly of the five-member body. Winslow, 61, an independent who was endorsed by county Republicans, is a Sears salesman and former program analyst for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Washington Post staff writer Charles W. Hall spoke with Winslow this week about how he plans to approach his new position. Here are edited excerpts from the interview.